models. The system shown in Fig. 11, for instance, differs from that shown in Fig. 9 for BB models, in that the piston 6 is connected by an operating lever 7 to the pump operating rod 8 by which the pump is operated from the throttle-valve mechanism. Thus, the pump piston 12 is positively operated on its downward stroke, and is caused to rise on its upward stroke by the piston spring 16, whereas, in the BB carburetor, the piston is pressed down by the spring and raised by the throttle connecting linkage.

25. In the system shown in Fig. 12, a combination of the methods shown in Figs. 9 and 11 is employed. There is a spring both above and below the accelerator pump piston. The upper spring 4 applies pressure on the piston 2 and moves it down when the throttle valve is opened, and the lower spring 6 forces the piston up when the pressure is released. The purpose of the gage 8 is explained further on in this text.

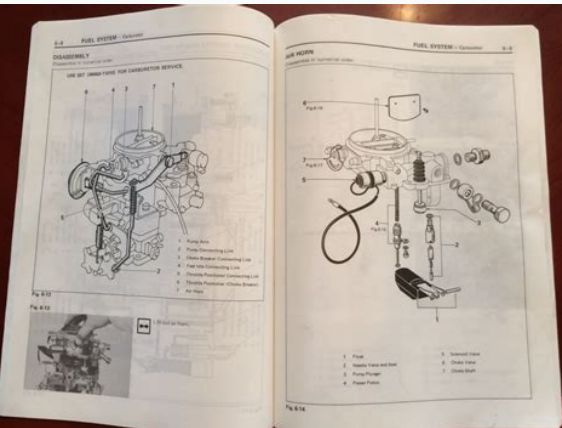

26. Two methods are employed to prevent gasoline from being drawn into the throat of the carburetor through the accelerator pump jet from the accelerator system during fixed throttle operation at intermediate speeds and high speeds. One method is by means of an air vent, as shown in connection with the BB carburetor, and the other method consists of a disk check valve that opens to the atmosphere and breaks the vacuum in the accelerator system.

Anti-Percolating Unit

27. While a car is being driven, the carburetor is kept cool by the large volume of air passing through it and by the absorption of heat in the atomization of the fuel. When the car and engine are stopped, however, the cooling system is not able to carry off the heat stored up in the engine parts, and it is radiated into the air under the hood. The carburetor absorbs this heat so that in hot weather or after hard driving the fuel in the float bowl may boil. The vapor bubbles will rise and those trapped in the passage to the main discharge nozzle will push gasoline ahead of them and out of the nozzle into the venturi. As the bubbles continue to form, additional gasoline is forced out and floods the manifold. This flooded manifold condition makes restarting of the engine difficult.

28. To prevent this action, which is known as percolation, an anti-percolating valve is incorporated in the carburetor. It is designed in two general types, namely, the saxophone type and the piston type. Modifications of these two types have also been used. A saxophone type is shown in the diagrammatic sectional view in Fig. 13 (a) and a piston type in view (b). The anti-percolator valve opens and closes a vent into a passage that connects directly with the bottom of the main discharge nozzle, and carries off any vapor bubbles that may form, so that gasoline is not forced out of the nozzle. The valve is opened by the throttle linkage when the throttle valve closes to its idle position, and closes with the slightest opening of the throttle.

The anti-percolator valve must be properly adjusted, because if it opens too early when the engine is slowed down, a quantity of air may be drawn into the high-speed system and cause a flat spot when the engine is accelerated. If the valve fails to open,
